Looking back to 1983, just before the breakup of the Bell System, AT&amp;amp; T formed its American Bell subsidiary in preparation for competing in unregulated markets against various telecommunications equipment companies, and also against established computer providers such as IBM and DEC. In 1984, American Bell became AT&amp;amp;amp; T Information Systems (a better name for selling computers, along with the fact that they were forced to drop Bell's name at the breakdown). Computer media realized that AT&amp;amp; T had the deep pockets (even after divestment) to compete with IBM. Several clash headline incarnations of the Titans were seen everywhere, and the world huddled at AT&amp;amp; T to take a healthy chunk of the desktop computing market away from IBM. Upstarts like Compaq and later PC's Limited (which was an enigma for polishing AT&amp;amp; T execs), did not have the opportunity to have considerable market shares once AT&amp;amp; T went into photography. The PC business would be dominated by the two titans. AT&amp;amp; T worked feverishly to develop PC systems based on the 8086 and 80286 series in conjunction with Olivetti in the mid-1980s, and also developed a wide line of minicomputers (the 3B series), some of which were highly tolerant and powerful minicomputers systems (the type of computers that kept the world's most reliable and largest computer/communications network running – the Bell telephone system).
